ECONOMIC OVERVIEW

Devastating hurricanes, geopolitical uncertainty and the US debt ceiling have caught investor’s attention in the past week. Meanwhile strong economic data from most regions confirms synchronised global growth remains in place, financial conditions are exceptionally easy – at least for the time being while inflation surprises on the downside – and investor sentiment is far from euphoric. Recent manufacturing and trade data from Japan and China confirm the ‘cyclical’ acceleration. The outlier in economic terms is increasingly the UK where Brexit uncertainty and real incomes squeezed by sterling depreciation are constraining economic growth. This week’s data releases include the US and UK inflation and retail sales data, as well as UK wages and the Bank of England interest rates decision (no change expected). While the majority of central banks are clearly signalling a tapering of quantitative easing and how interest rates might develop thereafter, markets continue to price a low likelihood of rate rises with even the US only discounting a 25% probability of a December hike. Bond yields were mostly lower on the week with the UK 10-yr dipping below 1% once again.

MARKET OVERVIEW

Asian markets were strong this morning, perhaps for no other reason than the fact that North Korea did not test a missile over the weekend! This has fed through to a good start for Europe today. One of the interesting features for portfolio managers is that sectors don’t always perform as you might expect. At present, the global economy is in good shape, manufacturing leading indicators (PMIs) point to a continued expansion of growth, and commodity prices are firm. Needless to say this has been reflected in good performance from mining shares and selected industrials. A background such as this would point to rising bond yields as inflation risks increase and a corresponding good performance for shares in financial sectors. However, bond yields have been declining and yield curves flattening, totally counter to what the economic growth indicators would suggest. As a result, financials, particularly banks, have been relatively poor performers of late. Why is this the case?

There is a divergence between what central banks want the markets to believe and what the markets themselves are willing to price in. The Bank of England has been at pains to suggest that the market is underestimating where interest rates may have to be over the next year or so, given current growth rates. Markets are not convinced. Although employment growth has been strong both here in the UK and in the US, there is very little evidence of wage pressure – the sort of pressure that could lead to higher inflation. Thus, inflation expectations and interest rate expectations have fallen in recent weeks, pushing bond yields down. The inflationary pressures of higher oil prices have also receded on a year on year basis, leaving little evidence of domestically generated inflation. Economic growth and full employment but without inflation? Macroeconomic textbooks have had to be rewritten to take account of quantitative easing and negative interest rates. The same may now be true of microeconomics textbooks to reflect structural changes in labour markets.
